The Liberties of Matrimony By Dorothy Dix

The affinity, however, does not its ure in the ordinary family circle, and the average husband and wife receive no letters from a more exciting source than sister Susan, or grandma, or cousin Jane, or some old friend. Why any human being, except the one to whom they are addressed, wants to read the unexciting chronicles set down in these epistles, masses comprehension.

Nevertheless, it is the fill-bred habit of many husbands and wives to open each other's letters and read the confidences that were never meinst for their syes. It is a sort of listening at the keyhole that does not endear the Paul Pry or the Polly Pry to his or her wife or husband.

It is not that the wife or husband has any guilty secret that is hidden in the letter, but no woman or man of real refinement tells all of his or her family and friends' affairs even to his wife or husband. John Smith, fine and honorable, and devoted to his wife, shrinks from laying before her eyes the sorrowful story his sister has written him about a wayward boy who has been eaught robbing a cash drawer. Mary Smith, as loyal a wife as ever lived, cannot bear that her husband should read her mother's letter in which she sobs out the pittful tale of how Mary's father has been drinking again, and has spent the rent money on liquor, and how they are to pay the grocery man, she doesn't know.

Their Jenlousics.

Generally speaking most husbands and most wives are jealous of each other's families, and prone to criticism of them. The family letters furnish material for criminations, and lead to recriminations and to demestic spats. For that reason alone, if for no other, husbands and wives have no bushess meddling with each other's mail.

The opening of your letter brings home to you as nothing else can the

THE WAY OF A MAN By Beatrice Fairfax

"Out upon fit! I have loved Three whole days together; And am like to love three more. If it proves fair weather."—Sir John Suckling.

ROKEN-HEARTED writes. "I am keeping company with a young man for the last four a young man for the last four years. I am a girl of 22, and he is 25. When I first met him he was carning only $12 a week, and sald he could not marry on that salary, but would as soon ha he got a better position. He succeeded in getting it, and has had it a year, but now says he fears it would break his mother a hear! He is not her sole support, as she has four more children working for her.

"Broken-Hearted."

This girl's atory is one that has been told countless times in many climes and many languages. She loved a man; he loved her. He couldn't afford to marry, and she argeed to wait for wider opportunity for knowing other gisis who are younger, fairer and fresher. It may occur to him that the girl who has waited for him it too old for him, and if he does he is not the first man to have this opinion, as thousands of neglected sweethearts will treatly.

He begins to delay the wedding day, building up one flimsy excuse on top of another. The girl, after the manner of her sex, is distressed, and shows it. In a way, it seems to her that the end of the world has come.

She has spent the best part of her girlhood in planning, hoping, waiting. During all these years she has made-him feel so sure of her constancy that he has grown to cherish it as lightly as he charishes the love of a sister.
It is all wrong. Every long engagement is an injustice to the girl for the very reason that man so often proves to marry, and she argeed to wait for him.

Long Engagements.

Long engagements have a way of weakening a man's lave. He is sure of the girl; courtship lacks the incentive that uncertainty gives. He begins to feel as bored as a married man with this difference. There are no legal bonds lying him.

He grows forgetful of her faithfullers. His increased wages give him

Partly to Blame.

And I claim that the girl is partly to blame. She is so much in love she makes all of love's sacrifices. She gives up the friendship of other men, and often that of other women. She is waiting for him. He knows she is waiting; he is sure she will continue to wait and it is an unusual man who will run to a destination, knowing that the one waiting for him will continue to wait thaugh he lags on the way.
